THE PRINTERMAN'S LIFE.

His Daily Walk and How the Round

Yes, verily, a printer's life is full of changes,—hut very little "change." He goeth forth in the morning, hilthe as a isrk, with an empty stomach and a lack of funds. At the corner he seeth a man on the next block who oweth him $3 15.
The man turneth and walketh the other way, for he liketh not to meet the printer whom he sweth. The printer wadeth on a little farther and meeteth the bank teller with a draft for $10 50 and exchange, The printer sayeth, "Go to, I will pay thee temorrow." The telier answershim thusiy: "Behold, now I have held this draft for seventeen days, and thy 'tumor row' has become a chestnut," and he turneth away wroth. And yet the printe smiles on before the thoughtless world. He goeth to his office end maketh out statements for $817-75 due him and goeth farth to collect the wherewith to pay the draft and his reni, and pay his corey bill, and his meat bill, and his doubt log bill, and his payer bill, and his cas bill, and his cond bill, and his cas bill, and his cond bill, and incidentally to get his wife a new calloo dress, and a pair of copper tood shoes for each of his children, and a thousand and one other intil children, and a thousand and one other little library, and a thousand had not other little library his constraint of the library bill and his weekly payed. Johnnie is of a convivial turn and likes othing better than a jag. So being from under Government surveilance he deter

Now, Johnnie had cut many a funny caper in his time, and doubtiess a good nany that were not funny.

Once upon a time the said Johnnie walked out of Joe Ryan's back door at Washington, which was some tweive feet higher than the front, and gathered him-self up and kept on as if nothing unusual had happened, while everyone thought he had surely broken his neck.

The caper he cut this time, though, beats his door feat, we think, for they eav at Washington that Johnnie, while in his cups, admitted that he cast his vote for Bradley, and that he came on for that

Is it any wonder that the Democrats were heaten when everybody was against them and they were against themselves?
